National Oil Companies: Roles, Governance and Risks in a Changing Future

This session will present the results of recent and evolving work on national oil companies (NOCs). These companies play a central part in global oil markets, and a dominant role in their home economies. In spite of their importance, NOCs have traditionally been poorly understood, and prone to opacity and mis-governance. The session will present the Natural Resource Governance Institute’s National Oil Company Database – the world’s largest public repository of data on NOC operations, revenues, debts, fiscal contributions and performance. It will draw on the data to highlight key areas of concern for governments and international institutions around NOC governance, stewardship of public resources and economic resilience amidst the global energy transition.

Patrick Heller is an advisor at the Natural Resource Governance Institute (NRGI) and a senior visiting fellow at the Center for Law, Energy & the Environment (CLEE) at the University of California, Berkeley. He has worked on legal reform and governance initiatives in the developing world for more than 20 years for organizations including USAID, the U.S. State Department, the Asian Development Bank, Creative Associates International and the International Center for Transitional Justice.
